

Marie Curie was a pioneering scientist who discovered the elements radium and polonium. She conducted groundbreaking research on radioactivity and won the Nobel Prize in Physics in 1903 alongside Pierre Curie and Henri Becquerel. Later, she received a second Nobel Prize in Chemistry in 1911 for her work on radioactive elements. Marie Curie's discoveries significantly advanced medical treatments and deepened scientific understanding of atomic structure.